Sustained release of topically applied growth hormone for the treatment of dermatological disorders: an approach to rational therapy. Long-acting topically applied growth hormone (GH) was developed in a stepwise fashion and the results of the first three clinical trials are reviewed. In the first phase of the development program, the chemical, physical and biological properties of the polymeric carrier were evaluated. It is suggested that the development of an improved carrier system will improve the effect and reduce the side effects of GH. In the second phase, a vehicle for sustained release of GH was designed and tested in animals. In the third phase, the vehicle and the growth factor were combined to develop a formulation with the desired characteristics. The carriers that proved most successful in the three clinical trials consisted of Polyethylene glycol 4000 (PEG 4000) modified with stearic acid and hydroxypropylmethyl cellulose (HPMC) gels. The modified PEG had a molecular weight of 4000 Da, while the gel-forming HPMC had a molecular weight of 90,000 Da. The dosage in the three studies was 6 mg/day. The duration of action was from one to four months. In animal studies with a new formulation of GH, there was a 10- to 50-fold increase in serum concentrations of GH. In addition, serum levels of insulin-like growth factor-1 increased from baseline to between 2 and 3 times normal, while serum levels of insulin decreased from baseline to less than half of normal. Finally, the formulation was found to be well tolerated by all the animals treated.
