In the year 1001 of the Age of Humans, Emil was found by the leader of the Elven, and adopted into the Elven race. Raised as a member of the Elven race, Emil spent his youth learning about the arcane secrets of the Elden Ring, alongside his peers called “Bookmarkers” – a race of people who gain their power from the healing, reviving, and investigation powers of songs and dances. In the lands between the lands of the Elves, the Bookmarkers made a secret society called the Elden Ring. The secret tale of Emil, as told by his

"We're always striving to do what's best for voters," Messina told "CBS This Morning" on Friday. "The best thing for voters is to go to the polls." Democratic messaging After spending the last two weeks roiling the presidential race with negative ads and a flurry of controversies, Democrats are now facing a choice: Win or lose. But the party's presidential nominees are not making the case that losing would be the best outcome. "She can be president," said Vice President Joe Biden, referring to Hillary Clinton. "She's prepared. She's ready. She's ready to take on this country. I believe she's the best qualified. That's not a threat. I'm not saying she's going to win. I'm saying she's qualified to be president." During the Democratic National Convention in Philadelphia this past week, Clinton's remarks often shifted to the less-fraught message of how running a state is the same as being president. "We've gotten to know you, Iowa. You've called me home," Clinton said in the closing speech. "I love you. I'd rather be here with you than anywhere else." Jim Messina, who ran Obama's 2012 reelection campaign, said the former president was largely going to ignore Clinton's attacks on him and the long-standing sentiment among Democrats that she is the more experienced candidate. At the same time, the Obama campaign's new discipline in black and Latino messaging is having an effect. Obama himself has been on message, playing the role of presidential statesman by focusing on rebuilding the middle class and the push to reform the tax code. But the pivot toward a message of change has already made its mark in some of his campaign's biggest gains, including with one of his most important constituencies: African-Americans. Obama opened his weekly radio address on Friday by telling voters that the last six years "were years of crisis, with Washington divided and turning its back on the people." "But that's not what we're going to do," Obama said. "In this election, we

It's the coolest job on the Internet - max0563 ===== mainguy Edit: It takes everyone with programming experience very, very long to make the slightest progress at starting a product. If you can program, you should start a product. If you still think that starting a product is stupid then good. ~~~ Skywing Let's be clear that starting a product is an extremely difficult task. You have to please a lot of people, and you're trying to build a system that is quite complex and is actually intended to last for a long time. Of course, that's true for anything you would do, but I think if you're just staring at your code with nowhere to go to and you actively wish it to be "the coolest job on the Internet", then you were aware this would be an extremely hard and frustrating task. ----- zeruch I'm not quite sure that Seth was claiming he was "starting a startup", but rather that for programmers moving into startups they need to think about and define their role out of the ordinary. ----- zbanks Whilst I concede a lot of what he's arguing is true, I was actually a bit disappointed with him. The infographic, while well-constructed and well-worked-out, gave a gross mismatch of the word Startup (at least a 'real startup') and the meaning of that word in his interpretation of it.
