En el sitio de Greylist puedes ver algunos de los eventos que invocan la petición Ajax, por ejemplo de esta manera: $(document).on("click", ".open", function() { var id = $(this).data('id'); var url = ''+id; $.ajax({ type: "GET", url: url, cache: false, dataType: "text", success: function(data) { console.log(data); alert('OK'); } }); }) En el sitio de Greylist también puedes ver las peticiones Ajax requeridas por un usuario. Aqui puedes ver que la petición ajax fuera de tu JavaScript la realiza el navegador y esto es normal: Pero, si tu petición ajax es mucho mas extensa que el código JavaScript es posible que tu petición ajax esté atrapada en el procesamiento de la página y que el navegador no sepa qué petición realizar, y esto es bastante extraño. problem. Friday, September 27, 2009 Yes, I'm still here. I wish I could say the same for the blog, but I've been busy, being that we've entered the wet season. We've had rain and heat for the last few days and it's been driving us crazy!! Yesterday afternoon I noticed a bit of a strange smell wafting from the breeze...it was strange and it's a scent I've never smelled before. I tried to figure out what it was, and I think I have an idea, but I need to verify. It may not be conclusive at all but I think the answer is, yep...it's coming from the banana plants. Yep. The banana plant is throwing out some funky-smelling fruit. Here's a hint to the family of who should just buy all my bananas!!! lol Here's a shot of the banana plant...yes, banana plants smell kinda funky, but they also make great banana plants. They will work just fine without a ladder, and they are drought-tolerant. They can be trained to grow against a wall if desired, and are also beautiful to look at. They are a great alternative to the awful single bananas that are sold on every corner of the country. I don't know if they are true hybrid plants...if they are they are 'green' bananas. We still have lots of plantings of bananas and are going to be picking all the fruit for as long as the seasons allows. Once we're done with the bananas, we'll be picking the other fruits too, but they are more of a pain than the bananas. There's a guy here in the 'farm' that sells a fruit that we haven't had access to yet this year. It's a nice tart d0c515b9f4

A: The problem is that you have not fixed the Windows 8.1 machine. That is the only issue preventing you from starting. Q: How to display a pop up spinner with user logon in the windows form c# Hi i need to display a spinw in the form load function because i don't want the user to wait for the form load. How can I do that using c#? A: The solution is to use ShowDialog() and the form will appear asynchronously when the job ends: private void startForm() { Form1 frm = new Form1(); DialogResult dr = frm.ShowDialog(); if (dr == DialogResult.OK) { //... } } You can achieve the same result with a normal method: private void showSpinner() { Form1 frm = new Form1(); frm.Show(); } But it is recommended to use ShowDialog(), because it is a multithreaded method. This invention relates to the field of personal safety. More specifically, this invention relates to a taser that is activated by a high-powered stream of water. Existing watercannons, such as those used on SWAT vehicles, are capable of striking their targets with a deadly force when activated. However, the user must release his aiming device, such as a scope, in order to release the water. The user then has a lack of control over the stream of water. The effectiveness of such a device is further limited due to the delay between the activation of the stream of water and the release of the water. Existing water cannons are also unsafe, because the user is unsure where the device is pointed and therefore cannot control the force of the stream of water. There are other existing water cannons that fire a stream of water, but these cannons are not capable of being fired at a target. Furthermore, the stream of water is not released until the user pushes a button or device which activates the stream of water. These devices also have the same limitations as existing water cannons.Sooooo...I just finished reading this thread. And it seems like we all agree that NEF is preferable to more "modern" formats. We all
