Today's most popular. "A lot of blue-collar guys, they don't want to take the test," said Steven Cozia, a lifelong Metro rail rider who in recent years has worked as a pipe fitter. "It's just too long and too much of a hassle." But Los Angeles Metro and Metrolink have found ways around the barriers. The state requires the agency, which runs the rail system, to conduct random tests — no excuses accepted — and met the obligation last year for the first time since the law was passed a decade ago. The result was that Metro and Metrolink police in Southern California were arresting up to four times more people than they did in 2015. Blue-collar workers are a key target group. Metro says only 9 percent of the employees on its payroll are white-collar professionals, and many operate heavy equipment or are responsible for cleaning and assembling rails and signs. Metrolink describes its employee base as "blue-collar bluebloods," and trains "are where they train." In fact, Metrolink has drawn workers in the same way that Las Vegas has sought construction workers, said Alicia Trostle, the regional director for Metrolink. It has boosted salaries by paying them more than $125,000, she said, and because they share the risk of injury, Metrolink says it can afford to offer reduced insurance. "We're trying to mirror what we see in other industries," Ms. Trostle said.
