in the battle of stalingrad, the soviet forces are caught off guard as the german sixth army attacks. the german attack causes great damage to the soviets, with the soviet garrison suffering heavy casualties. stalin gathers the remnants of his army, which includes the remnants of the red army's 13th army and many shock units, and prepares for a counterattack. stalin's forces are reorganized, and the red army launches operation uranus. the germans, however, aren't ready, and they face stiff resistance from the soviets and a large battle ensues. operation uranus is a disaster for the soviets, and after another disastrous assault, stalin has no choice but to call in all reserves, including the elite divisions of the soviet airborne forces. over the next few months, the germans continue to push the soviets back, but eventually the german forces are worn down, and many of their units are caught in the open in the middle of the steppe. the allies, meanwhile, are unable to conduct large-scale missions in the eastern front, as the germans have taken up the bulk of the available space. to make matters worse for the allies, the panzer divisions, who were worn down in the desert, are finally ready to fight again. however, the allies lack the means to stop the german juggernaut. the allies, instead, launch operation steppenwolf, which is a sneak attack against the vital german port of rostov. the operation is a success, and the port is taken by the allies. we have one report of a russian made mi-35 attack helicopter being used to assist in the venezuelan army and national guard's assault on the city of valencia. although this could have been to counter the american supply drops to anti-maduro forces, it could have been to protect maduro's forces at the time. the mi-35 is a pretty good platform for this. 5ec8ef588b
